Some more experimentations - hey - what's blocking the exit there Posted by Thod - 2007/02/19 21:29
All
I experimented a little bit with a transparent wall (formerly known as ice wall) by adding some glitter. Seems the first time around I might have added too much. The first photos with flash rather look like a wall of blood to me. Well - you seldom get it right the first time around.
Not necessarily what I exactly had in mind - but I think it still looks quite cool - nearly organic and living. I surely will find some uses for it. And I'm quite sure this would work in a SF setting as well.

I think you should sell these pictures as a triptych entitled "JelloJelloEeevil Jello"
Just messin' with ya. Actually, I thought "wall of blood" as well, but the bricks make it a bit likewell, jello blood. A true wall of blood would be either solid or like a waterfall, I'd think flowy and drippy.
Still, it's a neat experiment. It does look faintly magical, even if it's sorta indeterminate.

I will probably keep experimenting. It actually has a more glitter effect in real - making it more magical.

My problem with this experiments is - I often unpop or finish the stuff in the evening - and have to use the light source around as I just can't wait for the next weekend to make photos in proper light ...

I still have a few more 'colours'. There is gold and silver to try.

Thanks for the great idea. At first it didn't knew what a stun jelly is. But indeed - this wall would work pretty well. Exactly the right size - and you could use on if the slamming doors during build-up of the dungeon and just replace it when the jelly attacks.
On another note
My son came down this morning - looked at the wall and asked - daddy - is this a magical wall. How have you done it ;-) Yes - it looks more glittery / magical when you see it directly,
Sometimes it can be so rewarding being a proud father.
