Yes everything you get from DF are hand painted from the factory (workshop). Older sets use to use bow ties to to attach pieces together. They have done away with those. The piece together by just sliding the desired pieces you want with each other.

I Would check out some of the pictures in the Cool Photos of DF sets or even check out the main page. Look under the different type of sets and see how they go together there.

Welcome Denizen!

Each piece also has felt attached to the bottom which prevents them from sliding around - also each piece has a good amount of mass to it. Together (felt+mass) the pieces stay put very well, even with table bumps, miniature moving, dice rolling etc I've never had a problem with them not staying lined up and in place during a session.

Cheers!

ps - if you've never seen DF in person, held a piece in your hand, prepare to be blown away!!!

I concur with Harneloot's statement! Once you feel the parts in your hand, then the addiction starts. I love DF!

Indeed, pictures don't do justice to the real thing.

On a side note, how do you keep excited players from tossing dice into your very expensive sets? Before you answer, let me say that I have carpeting on my floors, so getting bloodstains out will be too much trouble...

Get a shallow box (like the lid of a shoebox, or one of the more expensive wooden round boxes lined with felt) and tell everyone that die rolls only count if the dice are rolled in the box. (You'll have to roll in the box too.)

One natural 20 that doesn't count because it wasn't "in the zone" will cure everyone of their bad dice habits.

I usually roll into the dungeon, or into the spaces between the dungeon, but, yes, I do not use my fancy tiger eye carved dice for fear that the dice will get chipped.....
