If you placed a pre-order for any Dwarven Forge stuff:

1) Thanks for your support and trust. Your pre-order helps us produce more sets and stock more stuff. Thanks!

2) All pre-orders are going to be shipped out today. You should get an email from "Quantumview" tonight with your tracking number.

Thanks again for the support!

Jeff

That is amazing news!

Miniature fantasy settings have always been a fascination of mine, but one that I have never really given serious consideration until I found Dwarven Forge. I remember seeing small towns and the like made out of milk cartons on tv and after school specials or even some of the more elaborate set ups like the scenery on movies like Labyrinth and thinking to myself, wow wouldn't it be great to be able to construct my own small cities, or layouts (I was even fascinated by the small elaborate set ups that some train set builders built). The ideas never blossomed further than that and eventually I would play with toys like He-Man and G.I.Joe, but the magic just never really seemed to be there like it was when I saw those small cities laid out when I was younger. They were fun to play with but just didn't hold the same amount of imagination. When I was introduced to role playing through Dungeons and Dragons, I never thought about using third dimensional environments. Everything was simply on graph paper. When I eventually saw some 3d layouts and some of the miniatures I almost wished it stayed on graph paper. coughs

This all changed when I came across the Dwarven Forge website and saw the pictures. I was taken back to those imaginative moments when I was a child except this time it was possible to obtain parts to the whole that could be purchased as I desired to build whatever I happened to want to create. No only could I build some interesting and realistic looking settings, but I could use them to enhance my roleplaying experience! I honestly feel that Dwarven Forge does not detract from the imagination and in fact adds to it. Just look at the eyes of all the adults that look at a layout for the first time set in Dwarven Forge. You will see the magic and wonder there. :)

That being said, this shipment will allow me to create quite a bit more than my previous sets as i've only recently started collecting and I can barely contain my excitement. The imagination is going wild and I already have tons of ideas I can not wait to try out.

Should I be concerned if I still haven't recieved my email? I looked at my Account History, and my pre-orders still say "Your order has been sent to the warehouse," It doesn't say "Shipped" yet.

You seem to be a new customer - at least new on these boards to post. First - Welcome !!

The arrival of a container is always the most busy time. I realized this earlier this year when we had to ship out the pre-orders in Europe and when I was too optimistic how quickly we get everything out (I'm the distibutor for Europe).

In addition, the status needs manual update and tends to be the last you do when you are sure all is out. So there is a good chance if you are in the US that it arrives ahead of the e-mail.

If you are oversea (Australia ?) then there can be one or two days delay as these orders are processed seperately.

I don't have insider information as my shop is not linked up and can't check your order. But I hope it helps to settle any concerns until Jeff can give you a more definitive answer.

So concern - not really. No worry - this will work out. DF isn't as big as Amazon and some bits don't work as sleek - but it has it's advantages to have a more familiar atmosphere.

Thanks for the reply! I kind of figured this was the case. I've been buying DF stuff here and there for a few years now (I've just been lurking on the forums), and my orders' status are usually updated pretty quickly. I've never pre-ordered before though, and I suspected they probably have tons of orders to process. I have to admit, part of me was afraid that I might have been too late withmy pre-order, lol.
